Christmas Festivities at Stephenville—Knights of the Nippers.
Correspondence of the Gazette.

Stephenville, December 27.—Christmas has come and gone, and with it many of the joys and pleasures of the little folks. Christmas morning dawned here as beautiful and bright as ever a day dawned upon our country. The sun rose grand and majestic, and lighted up a cloudless sky; not a speck of cloud appeared anywhere to brood the air. The morning was a little frosty, though the air was balmy, and all nature conspired to make it truly a pleasant as well as a happy day.

The Christmas tree at the Baptist church was exhibited on Christmas eve night, and was not only a very pretty tree, but was beautifully and tastefully dressed, with many costly presents, as well as many cheaper ones for the little folks. The house is large and commodious, but was packed to its utmost capacity.

There was also a Christmas tree at the Methodist church on Christmas night, which was very pretty and on which were many nice and some costly presents. The Ladies Aid society had recently completed a very fine silk quilt which was offered for sale at the Christmas tree at the Methodist church, and brought the handsome little sum of sixty-five dollars. The object of the Ladies Aid society is to finish up and adorn and beautify the church here.

OUR LONDON LETTER.
Interesting Review of the O'Donnell Trial and Its Incidents.
How the Election of Mr. Carlisle Was Received in England.
Interesting Food Exhibit and the Future Food Supply.
"Ye Rumpsteak Pudding" at an Old Fleet Street Tavern.

Special Correspondence of the Gazette.
London, December 16.—Before this the GAZETTE readers have doubtless been informed of the result of the trial of Patrick O'Donnell for the murder of James Carey, the Irish informer. I had intended attending the trial and had my arrangements all made to that end, but a press of important business interfered and prevented me. I did go to the Old Bailey the second day of the trial with the view to seeing the prisoner, but I found it impossible to get inside the court room. Even the streets in the neighborhood were packed, mostly with Irishmen, who fondly hoped, doubtless, for a verdict of acquittal. As a matter of fact, though, there never was any ground on which to build a reasonable hope that the verdict (?) would be other than "guilty of murder." Before the trial I had a talk with Mr. Barry O'Brien, barrister at law, who occupies chambers with Mr. Sullivan, one of O'Donnell's counsel, and from him I learned that the case was what Texas lawyers call a case with "just a fighting chance" for the accused. I don't think the counsel for the accused had the slightest hope of saving their client's neck. The fact is, Carey was foully murdered, and the evidence to show it was absolutely overwhelming.

I have never had the slightest sympathy for the informer, who deserved his fate, if ever wretched wicked man deserved death. But O'Donnell had no right to murder him, and has deserved the fate that now awaits him. Before his trial I indulged the hope that the evidence would show no crime greater than manslaughter. But as a lawyer, I have no hesitancy in saying that if ever murder was proven against a prisoner it was proven in this trial. It was testified here for a while that O'Donnell was not an American citizen, hence not entitled to the special consideration shown to American citizens. It was shown, though, before the trial that he had been naturalized, and he was therefore tried by a jury composed one-half of British subjects, the other half of American citizens residing in England. In this respect then he has had no cause for complaint. It is also worthy of remark that the judge who sat in this case, if he leaned at all, leaned in favor of the accused, and not the other way.

For instance, Mr. Charles Russell, Q. C., who conducted the cause for the defense, had frankly to acknowledge that he had no direct testimony showing any attempt on the part of Carey against the life of O'Donnell. But still he asked the court to permit him to give to the jury the prisoner's version of the affair. At first Mr. Henry James, the attorney-general, who conducted the prosecution, objected on the ground that this was at variance with the precedents and was virtually making the accused a witness in his own defense, without having him sworn to precedents, he would permit the statement by defendant's counsel, as fully as if made by the defendant himself, in the absence of any counsel. Of course, Mr. Russell was able to put the matter to the jury very much stronger than O'Donnell himself could have put it, and really it was done in a most skillful manner. But there was no evidence to support the statement, and the jury did what they were compelled to do: returned a verdict of guilty of murder. I hardly think O'Donnell was prepared for such a result, though he had no reason to expect any other. When asked if he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed on him, he said he had not, but when it had been proposed and he was being taken from the court-room he made desperate resistance, all the while crying out that it was all a plot to destroy him. He also screamed out "To hell with England! and hurrah for the United States!" From parties who were present I learn that he broke down utterly and showed the craven most completely.

Of course there is no possible chance for a reprieve, and in a few days he will doubtless be executed, and thus will close another (may it be the last!) chapter in the history of crime that has carried to the death, first, Cavenish and Burke; then the "Invincible" who assassinated them; next the desperately wicked informer, who betrayed his associates to save his own miserable neck; and next will bring to the scaffold the man who took the matter of vengeance in his own hand and slew him.

Hydrophobia.
Jackson, Miss., December 30.—Two months ago T. H. Weathersby, sheriff of Madison county, was bitten by a mad-dog. A violent case of hydrophobia has now developed, and his death is regarded as inevitable.

These cables were published, of course, and several of the papers also published sketches of the life and political antecedents of Mr. Carlisle, showing him to be an advanced free-trader. But the most significant feature of this whole business was that they also devoted from two to three columns each to a discussion of the subject, the general conclusion being that England, and, indeed, the United Kingdom generally, has cause for gratulation that the doctrine of free-trade is prospectively soon to be the rule in the United States. I shall indulge in no comments on all this, but simply call attention of the people of the United States to the fact that it may be worth their while to consider whether a policy that promises so much of good to this country, is so pregnant with blessings to themselves.

THE FUTURE MEAT SUPPLY.
During the past week the subject of the future meat supply for the world has been receiving its little attention here at the hands of the English press. The Telegraph particularly went into it fully, and from a vast array of facts and figures deduces the conclusion that the demand for meat for food is increasing very much faster than the supply. In a letter written by me this week to the Live Stock Journal, I have given some of the figures bearing on the subject, so will not repeat them here. I will remark, though, in passing, that the conclusion of the Telegraph is that there is no possible danger of the supply being greater than the demand, and that instead of a prospect of lower prices for meat in the future the chances are all in favor of very much higher prices. I mention these facts that the readers of the GAZETTE, many, if not most, of whom are interested directly or indirectly in producing meat, may be encouraged to believe that they need have no fear of any serious and permanent "tumble in prices."

INTERNATIONAL FOOD EXHIBIT.
As incidental to this subject I will mention that it is proposed to open here in April, 1884, an International Food Exhibit, at which will be shown everything that is consumed by man as food. It is not quite certain as yet that this move will be pushed to success, but if it is, I want to say to the people of Texas that they will not be wise if they fail to make an exhibit of what Texas has done, is doing and is likely to do in the matter of supplying food for the world. Texas stockmen should be on hand to show how beef and mutton are produced in the United States, and sheep states of the American Union, and Texas sugar and rice growers should also show what they are doing for the comfort of the "human race" of the world. Millions of people from every quarter of the known world will "take in" the exhibition, and Texas can be better advertised here in three months, and for next to a song, than it can be advertised by the expenditure of thousands or tens of thousands in printing and distributing circulars and books. I trust some of the enterprising readers of this paper will take under advisement the proposition to have Texas properly represented here, and that the GAZETTE or the Loving Publishing company will "take a fair hand."

"YE RUMPSTEAK PUDDING."
While I am on the subject of "food," I must be permitted to mention that I enjoyed the privilege of partaking of "ye rumpsteak pudding" a few days since at no less celebrated a board than "The Cheese," wine often court, Fleet street. "The Cheese," or to give it its full title, "Ye Old Cheshire Cheese," is now the most historical tavern of all the old taverns in London. Nearly all the other taverns have had to make way for the more modern restaurant or public house. Little is known, it seems, of the very early history of the place. A brochure entitled "Round London," published in 1725, describes the house as "Ye Old Cheshire Cheese tavern, near ye Fleet Prison, an eating house for goodly fare." And now in 1883, or very near the beginning of the year 1884, I can bear cheerful witness to the fact that it still deserves to be classed with the very few public places in London where one can secure "goodly fare." The rumpsteak pudding which is the special feature of the place is certainly toothsome, and is not apt to be speedily forgotten by the palate. It has been served promptly at one o'clock p. m. every Saturday only, "since from the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," and the particular one that I insisted to dissect was enjoyed by quite a hundred persons. Though nominally a "steak-pudding," there are very many other ingredients in the dish than rumpsteak. It is said that for more than 200 years the old tavern has changed hands but twice and that it is now in the hands of the third family that has helped to keep up its ancient reputation. It is also said that the recipe by which the pudding is builded is a secret that belongs to the place, and is as secret as the "old coffee-room," and presented to Mr. Delamore (the landlord) in trust, to be handed down as a heir-loom to all future landlords of the Old Cheshire Cheese, wine office court, Fleet street. I tried to detect some of the good things that went to make up the pudding, and I am sure that I thought I discovered such dainties as larks, oysters, jiblets, etc. Naturally my inquiry was as to who were some of the gentlemen who frequented the old coffee-room and who helped pay for the Todd portrait, and the reply of one posted was about as follows: It is not on record that
